

Email is the lifeblood of modern business, and today most firms use email for taking orders, formalizing contracts, and discussing sensitive personnel issues. But as dependence on email has grown, so has its governmental and legal scrutiny. Poor data retention practices expose businesses of all sizes and in all industries to a host of potential legal problems, including heavy fines imposed by regulatory agencies, and presumed guilt or damaged reputation if subpoenaed records can't be produced.

Email also represents a significant weak point in many firms' efforts to protect intellectual property and to ensure employee adherence to company policy regarding dissemination of confidential information. It can be all too easy for employees to inadvertently or intentionally distribute highly sensitive information to unauthorized parties, leading to legal complications or loss of competitive advantage.

A proactive email archival or automated auditing program can allow your business to take control of the situation before it becomes a problem.
